

"Cinderella's Daughter"

By HAZEL DEYO BATCHELOR

SYNOPSIS

Virginia West enters boarding school and becomes very friendly with Kathleen Foster, one of the older girls. Virginia gives to Kathleen a girlish adoration, but there is a strain of solidity in Virginia's character that Kathleen cannot reach and influence, try as she may. Kathleen puzzles Virginia with her sudden engagement to a man she has only just met, and a man whom Virginia meets through Kathleen falls under Virginia's spell. Both girls are to spend the holidays at Virginia's home in the city. But Mrs. West, who is planning to take care of two school girls is astonished when they arrive.

VIRGINIA, never having approached her mother with anything but little-girl confidences, could have no idea how Mrs. West would feel about anything else. But when Virginia spoke with that warm note in her voice Mrs. West knew that she could have but one thought in her mind, a man.

"You know, Mother," Virginia began tentatively, "things are so different at school."

"Different from what?"

"Oh, from things here at home. People don't seem to think the same things, and, of course, I never met any one here, only your friends—never any one, my own age."

"And so you have met some one your own age at school?"

"Yes, and I'm so eager for you to meet him, Mother."

Virginia's cheeks were flushed and her eyes were bright. This was the first time she had ever talked with her mother on an equal basis. She had always stood somewhat in awe of this lovely mother of hers; she had loved to watch Mrs. West sitting in her frilly negligee before the dressing table strewn with costly trifles, putting a finger polish on the already shining nails, touching the huge puff to her delicate shoulders and leaving a fine film of powder over the glass top of the table under which was stretched a cobwebby lace of the finest quality.

Mrs. West would laugh with amused tolerance at Virginia's absorbed face as she would catch the big black eyes fixed on her in the mirror. Then she would say:

"Have you done your lessons for to-morrow?"

And Virginia would nod a quick yes. "All of them?" Mrs. West would be eager to be rid of the child.

"Yes, there wasn't much."

"Why don't you read them. There's a new magazine on the table in the living room."

"I'd rather watch you, Mother."

And there had been something flattering about it—something new and fresh in the gaze of her daughter's wide eyes, and something disquieting and disconcerting at that.

Today Mrs. West looked at Virginia there was less of the old admiration and more of the straight camaraderie that one unconsciously gives to an equal. Virginia knew her mother was admired; now she, too, had an admirer and she was eager for her mother to know it. It made Mrs. West feel suddenly old. It was one thing to have a daughter who could be accounted for as a schoolgirl and quite another thing to have a chic young woman descend upon her in this fashion, a dangerous young woman at that, because of that wonderful passion, youth.

Mrs. West rose from the couch, fluttering her draperies and leaving behind her a scent of French perfume. She yawned prettily and patted her daughter on the head.

"You must tell me about it some other time, dear; I must dress for dinner now. I hope you and Kathleen are not going to be silly about boys at your age, Virginia, it's so foolish."

Kathleen came in with her blonde hair brushed straight back from her broad white forehead and her beautiful head thrown back. Her presence irritated Mrs. West still more. A girl had no business to be so lovely that her hair could be arranged as simply as that. Her own soft brown tresses were curled and arranged with scrupulous punctilious every day.

"I am going out for dinner," Mrs. West went on quite clearly. "Hannah will give you girls your dinner at 6, and I hope you will go to bed early. You're probably used to regular hours." And with a brilliant little smile Mrs. West trailed her draperies out of the room.

Kathleen and Virginia were left alone in the charming living room with its Wedge wood bowl of roses on the open piano and a small fire burning in the grate. Over it on the mantelpiece a French clock ticked out the time lazily, beneath the many stories of flowers from New York, and here they were dismissed like two children and told to go to bed early.

Music for Christmas Without Too Great a Strain on Your Pocketbook

A good phonograph that can play all disc records would carry "Merry Christmas" into whichever home it might go, for it carries the key to music for any mood.

The Solotone Phonograph Is $100

and is one of the finest moderately priced instruments on the market. The tone quality is exceptionally pure and the high tones are delightfully clear and light, with none of the blaring sound that is so disagreeable. Any good music on the Solotone is a joy, for the sound chamber is large and brings out the best of a record.

There are many good points that distinguish the Solotone from other instruments. It has a modulator that regulates the strength of tone, and, as it is on the outside, one can adjust it after the lid is down and the playing has begun. Not only is the motor of the Solotone noiseless, but unusually durable, and there are no annoying surface noises. You may choose a Solotone in a new Adam style with a rich brown mahogany-finish, or with a fumed oak finish.

$5 Down and $5 a Month

These terms apply not only to the Solotone, but also to all the other phonographs and Victrolas in the Little Phonograph Shop.
